

Wilderness House Literary Review 3/2

Nanette Rayman Rivera

Stem Lust

Would you understand? It is August. I am vanilla clouds spinning like hammocks, calling like rain in tongues I don't value. Or am I blue, a curbside flower faded as a rag doll, cinched at the waist, nameless as November?

Of what is left I wear old camisoles, pulped threads, immaculate as ru'ach to touch. There is a street, a crack pipe lane cutting between chain link fences and one ramshackle deli. It is Harlem, poor, shuttered eyes in shakedown for somewhere else, not here, everything outside too patent.

Know this. There's this hotel epoxied like a scar — fat tissue puckered into itself to signal the lost in their 2 a.m. rummaging. He cups his hands like crumpled paper cups at migraine-me, a free one on a fiend's grip on a stem-lust pins and needles.
Must be November, rain.

A voice jerks his finger past the spit, plays with it real nice, devil's dick sparking off the sun for his never-gets-a-job, schizophrenic anyway crack hankering run off, maggot-eyes bloating while his voices match the cadence of my rain.

I see him there ten blocks away, grateful on all fours, his lost or sold-his-belt pants falling, grateful to the roses stem and rocks alka-lining his lips.
Can you picture, can you get this husband starting that stem as his wife down the rabbit hole waysides, even in August or daylight?
This was the girl too pretty for mornings.

Wilderness House Literary Review 3/2

I was trying to sleep toward the beginning, to prism glass and make-believe-peace lied neatly pleated between a Japanese plum tree's fruit.
Rice-a-Roni frying on the stove.
You get the plot. It's the early '60's in August or November, in suburbia where all girls are waiting for the 6:11 Babylon train to drop off Daddy.
There is a security here.

Pink flamingos on two lawns swelter in August.
One breeze trills my mother's crimson wind chimes against the so clean you-might-walk-through pane in August in the '60's, rainbows glide along all Madelines in stiff yellow pinafores behind dining room doors, safe as delicate skeletons.

stem lust – Page 2

Near the hotel, in August, little girls wear low-cut tank tops across the alley wedge, pink against the slumping chain links.
They get lost in the sequel of scorched lips, light bright. And I just know it. There is something happening here to the sun where they walk - they both rise with a shrug that enervates the link between I and Thou in August or November where they structure their world in I – It, here, not somewhere else, to free their potential to be who they are, the drive-by drive to be high. In August, in November, in the absence of season.

Wilderness House Literary Review 3/2

Incarnate

Brought you home by a tug under your arms as one would a hefty bag or drunken lout.

Home from sullen water, disobedient, be dead—(Just don't drown), in from the gulf, and left the way a wave is, graceful and without target.

Wave could not see when the sand had turned cold, could only feel drizzle and inward it revolved on itself, now past able to intuit more.

Sand could not taste trenched apologies, or sodden sludge-grass, or blood-licked lips in from the lantern coast that punctured sea lavender to sorrel and silk to thread.

What's best kept is this copy of you, memory-shell.

Your gluttonous need for my skin. Your skin like a sweating sky, hovering. There, now, be alive, heart. Choose these sunflowers he brings you in lieu. They wave their twist-off faces crippled as studs beneath window sills. There, now. Maybe we can talk.