

Wilderness House Literary Review 6/3

Nancy Morgan-Boucher Way Back When

She was sitting. The fragmented sun fell high and hot on her upturned face. Her lovely hands and bare feet were bound with thin twines of hemp. People gathered to watch. She wavered; she was silent. They jeered; they called her witch.

I cast the first stone.